LILY, 7, GETS A NEW ROOM
'I want to spend more time playing and drawing and less time tidying, please!'

After buying their plot 10 years ago and saving the money to build, it took architects Rachael Bourne and Shane Blue 11 months to construct their eco-friendly "square doughnut". 'The house wraps around itself and all the rooms open on to a central courtyard which offers amazing flexibility – it's Spanish colonial style transported to Australia on a budget!'

EXPERIENCE HAS TAUGHT US EVERY THING WE KNOW

Rachael and Shane's self-built eco home in Seal Rocks, NSW, draws on their 20 years' experience of designing other people's houses. But just as influential was their time spent travelling and their love of the great outdoors... →

PATIENCE IS OUR BUILDING BLOCK

Rachael: We bought this plot of land 10 years ago without seeing it! But we knew the area – we'd worked on houses up here – and we knew we wanted a simple but flexible space. We just had to wait until we had the money to build...

Shane: You don't have to spend excessively to realise your vision. If you are clever and creative you can have great projects with a modest budget.

Rachael: Before our kids – Memphis, 13, Huon, 11, and Cibella, 8 – were born, we spent a year travelling. The idea of a central outdoor living space was inspired by houses we saw in Spain and Morocco – we really loved that way of living.

There are fabric-covered mattresses in the living room. 'Flexibility is a big thing,' says Shane. 'We rent the house out for 150 nights of the year, so we've chosen sofa covers that can easily be washed and changed. Storage under the seating in the lounge means we can stash things like board games and blankets. When we leave we just want to sweep the house out and lock it up, we don't want to spend our time here cleaning.'

FAST AND FUN OUTDOOR COOKING

Rachael: The kitchen is like the bedrooms – it has a roller door instead of a back wall. The room opens on to the courtyard so when you're cooking, you're still part of the social activities...

Shane: ...Or rather, cooking becomes a social activity! Most of the time we just cook with the barbecue, even for big celebratory meals. But we'll use the kitchen to prep the food, make a salad or cook pasta. We all help out.

Rachael: When you live outside as much as we do, you have to make the outdoors comfortable and flexible – it's like any other room in the house! Our chairs fold away when not in use and the table extends when we have guests. →

'Our neighbours often pop over to cook
'joined-up dinners' with us. And we're flexible for guests from further away too because lots of our seating doubles as beds.' Rachael

PLANNED AROUND THE ENDURING BEAUTY OF THE NATURAL WORLD

Shane: Seal Rocks is still a fishing community, and we've made an effort to design a structure that fits with all the fishermen's huts built in the 1950s and 60s. It's why we've used retro colours.

Rachael: And we were inspired by the surrounding forest: the green of the eucalyptus trees and brown of the bark. The orange is from a fungi we found and the kids' bedroom is green, blue and brown – the colours of a rock pool.

LIVING HERE IS A STEP UP FROM CAMPING

Shane: The house is the perfect base for beach trips. You come in, dump your surfboards by the door, hang your towel up, then wash the sand off in the shower.

Rachael: Because you enter via the courtyard, most of the sand falls through the deck. It means that the lounge and bedrooms stay sand-free. That's the theory, at least – with kids, it doesn't always work out that way.

QUESTION TIME

PAST... If we could go back in time we'd visit the late 1800s with its fascinating mix of design and craftsmanship.

PRESENT... There is a quote from Ingvar Kamprad up on our noticeboard: 'Expensive solutions are often signs of mediocrity.' We see it every day – it's a sentiment we aspire to in our own work.

FUTURE... Living so close to a national park, you have to be very sensitive to the environment. We've fitted solar panels on the roof, built with recycled and recyclable material, including locally milled timber; we use treated rainwater for drinking and washing, and we have a worm farm to turn waste into fertiliser. ■

'This is about rethinking our idea of home. We live inside-out, unrestricted by doors. We all do our own thing in different spaces yet still feel together because it's all open.' Rachael
